

Casey's Citation Guide for Papers

There are multiple, perfectly acceptable systems used by scholars to document their research. Even within political science, different journals use different citation guides. However, in order to avoid confusion, everyone in this course is required to use the parenthetical referencing system. This system uses a bibliography at the end of the text and notes in parentheses within the body of the text to indicate the source. Bibliographies should be listed alphabetically by authors' last names (or article title for anonymous articles) for all works cited. Do not do a separate book or article section. So the text will look something like this:

“...some scholars (Moran, 1998, p. 233) attribute high German unemployment to structural rigidities in the German political economy, while others (Howard, 2002, p. 127) see it more as the result of policies to achieve convergence for the euro. Having achieved this end, the fiscal environment will loosen, allowing employment to again rise (Hoffman and Riley, 2003, pp. 96-98).”

At the end of this paper would be a bibliography that looked like this:

Bibliography

Hoffman, Matthew and Riley, John (2003) European Economies in Recovery. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Howard, Alistair (2002) “Germany and the Euro” Comparative Politics 29:2, pp. 221-242.

Moran, John P (1998) Structural Rigidities in European Economies. New York: Westview Press.

Below is a basic guide for the most common types of sources. However, there are dozens of variations that cannot be covered in a handout. The only way to know how to deal with these is to consult a style manual. If you do not own one, you should purchase one. There are no hard and fast rules for when to reference something in your work. The general purpose is to allow the reader to go back and find the sources that you used in your paper, so you want to give them proper “directions”. In general, if you are representing the ideas of someone else – and absolutely when you are using their exact words! – then you should include a reference. The best rule of thumb is, if you are not sure if you need a reference or not, go ahead and include it. Better to “over-cite” than to “under-cite”. In addition, many of your sources will likely be gathered through online databases that contain PDF or html version of printed articles. Since these articles “original form” is a paper version, you should cite them as such. Articles should only be treated as web-based if they ONLY exist in electronic form.
